

Measuring relative effective content

Keng Meng Ng

The notion of a Turing reduction is one of the central notions in computability theory. The robustness of this notion means that it provides the standard tool for analysing the algorithmic content of different objects. However there are different reducibilities which may be more suitable in a different setting. We will discuss several - perhaps less well-known - reducibilities and survey recent results about them.